

Orienting a New Home Care Worker

If you have never had paid staff in your home, you might not know how to orient and train someone you hire. In Home Health Aides, How to Manage the People Who Help You, by Alfred DeGraff identifies five mistakes that can create problems between you and your worker:

- Not providing clear instructions
- Expecting the worker to provide duties that were not agreed upon or adding extra tasks at the last minute
- Not recognizing work well done
- Comparing them unfavorably to other workers
- Being either too critical or too passive when providing feedback

When training a worker to do a task, use this five-step process:

1. Tell the worker how to do the task
2. Show the worker how to do the task
3. Have the worker perform the task while you observe
4. Praise progress
5. Provide an opportunity to ask questions, and make sure the worker understand your answers

The checklist below can be used to help you provide a good orientation. Review all the information listed with the new worker. Also remember to show the worker the layout of the home, where the things he or she will need to do the job are kept, and how to operate appliances or medical devices.

Orientation Check-List

	Demonstrate how tasks should be done
	Information about the household routines
	Review emergency procedures and whom to contact
	Information about the care recipient's preferences (e.g., prefers formal address "Mr. Smith" – not "honey")
	Clear instructions about what is out of bounds (e.g., having visitors, changing the thermostat, smoking)
	A clear procedure for keeping track for cash dispensed and spent if the worker is responsible for shopping or other activities that require cash
	How to prevent/respond to potential problems such as wandering
	Information about what the person with Parkinson's enjoys doing and what he or she is able to do independently
	Caregiving tips peculiar to your loved one- this allows the worker to create a pleasant atmosphere and avoid doing anything disturbing
NOTES

For a word version of this form, contact Brooklyn White at brooklyn@parkinsonalabama.org